However, what you get is actually a system that isn't quite ready for prime time. On initial launch, you're asked to select your device, and select the duration you want to wait before capturing the images. Diff highlights differences in SQL, and make finding the difference between tables, views and queries much easier. In this article I show you how to use Diff to quickly diff all stored procedures in a SQL Server instance against each other, but also against a baseline. This article will walk you through using the SQL Server 2008 native diff (better known as SQLDIFF) command line tool with the "XML" style of output. This is the same kind of output that SQL Compare and SQL Compare XML produce. Overview: SQLDIFF is a command line tool to compare any two SQL Server objects to each other, and against a baseline. There are a few ways to use SQLDIFF, for example, you can compare a stored procedure to a baseline stored procedure. In this article, I show you how to use SQLDIFF to quickly diff all stored procedures in a SQL Server instance against each other, but also against a baseline. Before you can use SQLDIFF you must have it installed on your server, and set the "Output to file" option to make sure you have the path to your server object file ready. Setting the Output path: SQLDIFF can output to a file or to a table. It can also output to a file in the style of the SQL Compare Tools. The table style of output is the one we will be using in this article. To set the Output path 1. On the home screen, click on the "View" tab 2. Select "Output To File" 3. From the drop down select "Select a file path" 4. In the Save text box, enter the path to the database on your computer This output path is used to control where the output is stored. For example, if you enter the file path "C:\temp\", the output will be stored in that folder. Comparing the Procedures: The first thing you should do when you get the output from SQLDIFF is to remove the "/REVERTED", "/baseline" and "/base" from the output. Doing this will cause the output to contain only the differences between the original file and the comparison file. So if the stored procedure is called "sp_GetDatabases", you should see something like: After removing the text, you'll get the output as an XML file. The output
