To finance or not to finance? The implications of life expectancy on the corporate responsibility for health. The issue of financing health care by the social insurance system was a major topic in the debates of the Second International. The decision by the Second International to support this option was controversial, and the debate continues. A discussion that has been relatively neglected is the impact of changes in life expectancy on the ability of states to afford health care. Increases in life expectancy have been a hallmark of the past century, and are projected to continue. At the same time, the level of expenditure on health has grown enormously. How does this increase in health care financing interact with the extent of coverage and the nature of the financing? How can projections of future healthcare expenditures be used to inform financing options? In this paper, we use the case of Italy to examine the various consequences of increases in life expectancy for financing options in the country.
